

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This is the difficult juncture that comes towards the end of updating for the next edition, as I pause to remember those who have made a difference in my work. With advance apologies to anyone and everyone who has worked with me, advised and guided me in the last two years—whom I fail to mention—here goes.

Without the ongoing support of the American Immigration Lawyers Association (AILA), this book would not be possible, as it cannot, after all, edit, print, market, and ship itself. Thank you to the Board of Governors, the Executive Committee, Director Ben Johnson, and all the staff. A special thank you goes to Danielle Polen, Sarah Redzic, and my new editor, Jenni Dart. I appreciate your thoughtful work, good humor, and patience. Thank you to Marketing Director Mary Johnson. I also acknowledge the historical contributions of Tatia Gordon-Troy, former Director of Publications.

Many good friends and colleagues consistently make themselves available for advice, practice pointers, and inside intel through phone, text, and email circles. This book is equally part-research-part-experience. Everything I learn and do as a lawyer, the wins and losses, the good ideas and unfortunate missteps, they flow into these pages. So, the advice from colleagues and friends who share their thoughts and experiences is invaluable. Thank you. In 2025 into 2026, the circles have expanded as our clients are arrested and moved across country with startling disregard for their humanity. Longtime stalwarts include Randy McGrorty and the attorneys at Catholic Legal Services, Linda Osberg-Braun, John Gihon, Kari Fonte, Jerry Seipp, Michael Vastine, Sui Chung, David Stoller, Cheryl David, Cory Forman, Alex Solomiany, and Lindsey Gauzza. And there are other newish recipients of my pestering, including Mark Prada, Sophia Carballosa, Susan Roy, Javier Maldonado, Maggie Arias, Andrea Jackoski, Miguel Mora, Peterson St. Phillipe, Jodi Goodwin, Amanda Waterhouse, Ana Jhones, and Susana Abesada-Terk.

Fortunately, to pick the brain of my attorney associate, Jose William Alvarez—usually on federal civil procedure—I need only traverse our downtown Miami office and knock on his door. Thank you, Jose.

I acknowledge the great work of Trina Realmuto and Mary Kenney and their team of lawyers at the National Immigration Litigation Alliance (NILA). Their advice is so helpful, and they are doing great work for the national community.

On a personal note, I thank (this is one person now) my spouse, office manager, and greatest friend, Jose Alvarez. His support of this work has never faltered.

I also acknowledge my invaluable paralegal, Denisse Penaherrera, for keeping the office moving along while I take time to write.

As it turns out, writing acknowledgements has been quite heartening. Thanks also to you, the reader, for taking the time to research and ponder within these pages.
